N.Y. Post, Jan. 1922

At the same galleries two dozen paintings by Louis Charlot restrict themselves in hue and in all the many graceful accessories of notation. The artist, whether he is intent upon a village under snow or the portrait of a peasant, expounds his matter in simple terms. He insists on a paucity of qualities. The result is penetrating, his ideas have a graphic rigor, the strength insists on its prerogative, it hardly relies on any warm, lazy dominance.
